NATIONALISM AND SECESSION. octrine of state rights. There is no concealment in the effort to concentrate all power at Washington in the hands of the tederal government. This is well, can papers give to state rights is not the true one, and this is wrong. To hear their orators, or read their papers, one would suppose that state rights meant the sovereignty of the states over the general government in all things. This s not now and never was the doctrine. It is not necessary to go behind the constitution, to consider the manner of its adoption,to prove this. The constitution provides that all powers not granted by it to the general government are reserved to the states and the people thereof. This provision in itself, always quoted by advocates of home rule, proves that certain powers are possessed by the tederal government. These rights, these duties, these obligations, are as sacred and as much to be upheld as are the rights of the states. While this is true, the rights reserved to the states-the rights of local self government-the right to regulate the franchise within constitutional limits; the right to levy and collect direct taxes; the right to enforce order and dispense justice-are privileges as high and as much to be respected as are the rights granted to the central government. These powers and privileges are clearly defined, and where conflicts of jurisdiction arise, there need be no sort of trouble, as the constitution provides an arbiter in the State sovereignty, then, means that the state is severeign in her sphere, as the general government is sovereign in its sphere. What northern state would be willing to acknowledge otherwise were a federal congress, controlled by southern brigadiers, to take the notion o appoint her governor, her judges and her sheriffs? It is true that at one time in the history of the country there were advocates of the state rights doctrine who believed that that dogma included get as much as Texas and Kansas is state.
